

Nothing Less Than Complete Victory

President Bush addressed the National Endowment for Democracy yesterday. The White House called it a 'historic' speech, which is an exaggeration. But it was an important speech, taking the argument forwards (for instance by referring for the first time explicitly to the enemy's ideology), defining the nature of the war and current US policy. As often happens, it was under-reported and the summaries in the media were not very good. It's worth reading the speech itself.

Even if it means

nothing less than genocide.

Genocide?

By whom?
